One of the saddest things I found when I worked as a GP was seeing couples forced to separate after over 50 years of marriage, because one of them had grown too dependent to be looked after at home.

One of the things that we insisted upon when setting up Ardmillan Place was that couples could move into our Residential Aged Care suites together and be provided with the appropriate level of care to suit their respective needs. If one of the couple is perfectly independent, then they can continue to spend quality time with their partner without having to provide the level of personal care, which they would have to if they were living at home. In fact, the “well” partner can socialise with friends, play golf and take small trips in the knowledge that their spouse will be fed, bathed, entertained and generally cared for by our professional staff in a most luxurious setting. This level of choice means that both partners get what they need and the time they spend together is not as stressful.

It also means that as the “well” person gets older and requires more care, this can be provided in the same apartment. There is no need to move home or to be separated from their partner.

We believe that “ageing as couples” ensures the security of being able to plan for the future in the knowledge that couples will never be separated and can live full lives in comfort and dignity.
